

Banking on a recovery in one of the world's largest sectors

Global financials is one of the largest, most diverse sectors. For more than a decade it has been ignored by investors, overshadowed by the financial crisis and impacted by the global pandemic.

But as the economies across the world recover and rapid technological developments and regulatory change transform the sector, can investors afford to continue to overlook this long-term value opportunity?

Financials: coming in from the cold

Central banks globally have started raising interest rates at the fastest rate since prior to the global financial crisis. Against this background, financials, particularly bank shares, have been outperforming as they are one of the biggest beneficiaries of rising interest rates as it boosts their profitability. If interest expectations continue to rise, then we would expect the sector to follow.

In the meantime, absolute valuations remain low, relative valuations even more so. Investors are only just starting to price in the improving outlook for interest rates while positive earnings revisions and the removal of restrictions on capital return should all underpin a pick-up in the sectors relative performance.

"After nearly 15 years in the wilderness and very much out of favour, conditions are coming together where structural and cyclical factors should combine to re-rate Global Financials on both an absolute and relative basis. Indeed, the Board and I believe that an allocation to this large, diverse sector should be a core investment consideration in a portfolio, especially when you take into account that they are the main beneficiary of a strong economic recovery and potentially higher Government bond yields."

Robert Kyprianou,
PCFT Chairman

Financials: the deep recovery play

Value has endured its longest period of underperformance on record, with the gap in valuation between value and growth stocks reaching unprecedented levels last year – dispersions further heightened by the dramatic shock that the Coronavirus has had on the world economy. Highly leveraged to global economic growth, financials have begun to recover and are poised to further benefit as we look ahead to 2022.

- One of the largest sectors globally but under-owned in the UK
- An attractive entry point for a sector trading on multi-year lows
- Deeply correlated to any pick up in global economic growth
- Reform and balance sheet strengthening has structurally transformed financials, which are able to weather the current crisis
- Highly sensitive to interest rates, directly benefitting from rising bond yield

“As the most sensitive sector to the inflationary trade, financials would be a prime beneficiary of an upward shift in inflation and interest rate expectations. As the largest constituent of value indices, it provides diversification from growth sectors that have benefitted from ultra-low rates in recent years.”

George Barrow Fund Manager

Six financials themes for a post coronavirus world

The coronavirus has dominated newsflow and markets over the past year, with financials particularly impacted. But as the sector that oils the wheels of the global economy, financials will benefit as the recovery begins, with six key themes set to dominate the next decade.

Banks

Ten years since the financial sector troughed, banks have materially lagged the underlying equity market. But they remain the largest subsector globally, encompassing far more than the UK's underperforming banks. Despite the near-term impact of coronavirus, banks are structurally stronger and with changing models, offer geared exposure to a recovery in global growth – and are the Trust's largest overweight.

Emerging Markets

There are significant opportunities in emerging markets, reflecting the low penetration of financial services in the economies of many countries. The Trust was originally launched with over 20% of the portfolio in emerging markets and this was reduced to low single-digits in favour of increasing exposure to the US. Over the past two years exposure has been increased to c21% reflecting the value we see following their underperformance.

Non-life insurance and specialist underwriters

Non-life insurance remains a good counterbalance to the more cyclical parts of the portfolio and an area where the team has significant expertise, investing in companies with exposure to personal lines, commercial insurance and reinsurance or a combination, as well as insurance brokers and risk consultants. The recent increasing in insurance rates at above loss cost inflation provides a more favourable outlook for the sector.

Fintech

There remains a significant opportunity for both incumbents and new entrants in the sector. In the short term the opportunity is mostly in payments, where companies continue to benefit from the switch from cash to card payments and growth in e-commerce. But we also expect incumbents to start to see more of the benefit of their tech investments to their cost structure and operating profitability.

Small and mid caps

We have historically generated significant value investing in smaller or mid-cap financials. These include regional banks in the US, small specialist banks in the UK and elsewhere in Europe as well as specialty lenders in emerging markets. The opportunity is for smaller, focused banks and other financials to grow faster and take market share from their larger peers.

Credit

We invest across the debt capital structure of banks, insurance and life assurance companies and expect to see continued attractive opportunities to invest in bonds issued by companies which will include those that are temporarily out of favour where we believe the fundamentals are mispriced or below benchmark size and so offer a higher yield to compensate for illiquidity.
